Don't Be fooled By Disaster Scams - Lessons Learned

Overview

Citizens in our country are very generous when a disaster strikes - whether locally, nationally, or anywhere in the world. They see it as an opportunity to help fellow human beings by relieving their suffering. So every time there's an earthquake, volcanic eruption, flood, or terrorist act, citizens come forth with money, clothes, medical supplies, and food.

Unfortunately, scam artists see these tragedies as opportunities to enrich themselves. These scammers exploit the sympathy of donors - perhaps with a name sounding both compassionate and legitimate or with a heart-wrenching appeal - to steal the donations or fraudulently to obtain consumers' sensitive financial information.

You can avoid disaster scams and still make a positive contribution to relief and rebuilding projects. Here are some suggestions:

- Be cautious of email requests for donations by unfamiliar organizations, which may be nothing more than tricks by identity thieves to collect your personal information. Do not open such emails - after the Tsunami in Indonesia, many viruses were spread by bogus charity messages. Even if the email messages appear to come from a familiar charity, it's generally better to contact the charity independently to ensure its true identity.
• Before donating, search the Attorney General's website to see if the organization is registered to solicit in Michigan. (Be aware that some legitimate charities, including the American Red Cross and Salvation Army, do not appear in the Attorney General's database because they are exempt. Call the Attorney General's Charitable Trust Section if you have questions.) You'll also find important financial information regarding how the charity spends its money. Other sites with publicly available financial information for charities are the National Center for Charitable Statistics or Guidestar.

• Beware of unsolicited text messages and bogus appeals on social media sites such as Facebook and Twitter. Some leading relief charities, such as Catholic Relief Services and the American Red Cross, now accept donations via cell phone. But unsolicited text messages, like telephone and email communications, should be viewed with suspicion and handled with caution.

• Choose established charitable organizations that have a history of helping in disasters. The American Red Cross, United Way of America, Catholic Relief Services, and the Salvation Army are just a few among many charities that either give immediate relief or assist in rebuilding communities.
